

A NOTE TO THE READER

This book is a neopulp.

A neopulp is a book a person created, shaped and judged — and a machine wrote with them. The author is the one who takes responsibility for it: I created this, I shaped it, I judged it, and I stand behind it.

Before the machine, trying an idea could cost years, so most ideas were never tried. The strange book stayed a note in a drawer. The machine removes that friction, and the strange book gets made. Pulp democratized publishing. Neopulp democratizes experimentation.

The mark tells you what was done with that freedom: a human created this book, shaped it, judged it, and wouldn't sign it until every word was one they'd stand behind. It says so on the title page, without hedging, because a new medium is nothing to apologize for. Ask the camera.

A book isn't good because a human wrote every word, and it isn't bad because a machine wrote any of them. Judge the work first. The means of creation are not the measure of it. You will decide.

A human vision, perfected.
